Grew up in South Central Los Angeles, CA

I didn't initially plan on going to college during my senior year of high school I decided to apply to Loyola Marymount University (LMU) but didn't get in.

Started going to community college to earn credits and eventually reapplied to LMU and got accepted.

Graduated with a Bachelor's Degree in Television production and entertainment marketing.

I began interning on various films and television shows, which evolved into a freelance production coordinator job-I also worked part-time as a substitute teacher to make ends meet.

After a few years, I decided to start working more directly in marketing for various creative agencies and production studios.

I've worked as a marketing manager at Sony Pictures and a digital marketing director at Starz, where I was in charge of social media presence for their hit show "Power."

I'm now on the global creative marketing team at Netflix.

Think about your career development journey. Was it a direct route? Perhaps, your road took a while to figure out. It may have included detours or hurdles along the way. What were your milestones?

Can you imagine sharing your journey, perhaps even one milestone or hurdle that you conquered?

Students often shy away from asking career development questions or sharing that they feel lost as they believe we won't understand. By sharing our journeys, we have the opportunity to build stronger connections with our students, create safe spaces, encourage exploration, and increase college achievement.

My Career Milestones

Five large, white, rounded rectangular boxes are stacked vertically, intended for students to write their career milestones. The background is a map with various street names and colors.
